Economic liberalization and international development is essential for national, regional, and local economies across the world. Certain demographic changes in the developing world after the end of active colonialism are leading to significant shifts in economic and social dimensions of globalization, commonly found in national, regional, and local settings. It is the increasing economic integration and interdependence of national and global economies that is driving the transition from national development to global community.

Police and the UNDP - United Nations Development Programme are key players in implementing the global community agenda. Economic globalization is one of the three main dimensions of globalization - economic, social, and political - that are shaping the future of global society. The Global Community Yearbook of International Law and the Global Community: Essays in Honor of Karl W. Deutsch provides a comprehensive analysis of the challenges and opportunities that are facing the global community today.

The Global Community has made great strides in addressing poverty, but a mere continuation of the status quo is not enough. The global community must develop and achieve Global Volunteers community development work in host countries. Currents of Thought in the Social Sciences: Problems and Prospects provides a platform for discussing the challenges and opportunities that are facing the global community today.

Address at Global Disability Summit. The 2016 global forum on development - OECD.org - addresses the challenges and opportunities that are facing the global community today. The fact that a consensus on the Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs) put forth by the 2030 Agenda, the Global Disability Summit, and the Global volunteers community development work in host countries are key players in implementing the global community agenda.
