The Factory of Light: Tales from My Andalucian Village was written by Michael Jacobs. It provides a vivid, witty, and informative account of life in the Andalucian village of Frailes, near Jaén. The book is a picaresque memoir that captures the essence of Andalucian life and culture.

The village of Frailes is nestled in the Sierra de las Nieves, a mountainous region known for its pueblos blancos (white villages). It is a place where the people live a simple rural life, surrounded by natural beauty and the warmth of community. Jacobs, who moved to the village in the late 1990s, found it to be a place of refuge and inspiration. His energy, love of life, and sense of adventure are infectious, making the reader feel as though they are living through his experiences.

The Factory of Light is not just a travelogue, but a celebration of the culture, history, and people of Andalucia. Jacobs explores the local customs, traditions, and daily life, providing insights into the unique character of the region. He writes about the local cuisine, festivals, and events, creating a vivid picture of the place he called home.

The book also delves into the literary and historical significance of Andalucia, discussing the region's impact on literature and art. It mentions the English Romantic poet Byron's fascination with Andalucía, chronicled in his Don Juan (1819). The Factory of Light also touches on the subject of revolution, as Jacobs was a self-proclaimed Che Guevara admirer.
